What's New In?

Search and retrieval of data is a fundamental function of computer systems that operate with or without a network. A computer system that includes a network may operate as an "exchange server." An exchange server can perform many functions including routing incoming data from network nodes to an intended recipient, examining incoming data from each node to determine a destination network node for the data and transmitting the data to the appropriate node. The exchange server may also operate to receive incoming data from each network node and route the data to a "home." The "home" can perform functions such as routing the data to a final destination or delivering it to one or more application programs. An exchange server can also operate to receive an incoming data stream from a network node and to encapsulate the data to distribute the data stream to another network node, such as a server or an application server. A "data stream" or "data flow" refers to a continuous flow of data from a source to one or more destinations. A "data source" refers to a computer or other device that sends data, while a "data sink" refers to a computer or other device that receives data. An "asynchronous message flow" refers to a data stream in which information is transmitted from a data source to a data sink in a continuous, non-real-time manner. "Continuous data flow" refers to a data stream in which information is transmitted from a data source to a data sink in a continuous, real-time manner. A "message queue" is a data structure used by some networked computer systems to store data that needs to be transmitted from one computer or program to another. The data in a message queue is usually in a ready-to-transmit state. When a computer or program that stores data in the queue desires to transmit the data, it stores the data in the queue. When the transmission is complete, a notification is sent to the requesting computer or program. The notification may be asynchronous (i.e., the data is transmitted without waiting for an acknowledgment). However, in many cases, an acknowledgment is required. For example, an exchange server for a client-server network may store data in a queue associated with a request of a client computer to the exchange server. If the client does not acknowledge transmission of the data within a specified time, the exchange server may re-transmit the data to the client. Once the client acknowledges transmission of the data, the exchange server removes the data from the queue. One way to remove data from a message queue
