Real-time display. Network-based advertising systems typically provide advertisements to clients that request the advertisements. Such advertisements are typically served from servers that supply the advertisements to the clients, and as such, such advertisements are selected based on statistics related to users that request advertisements through the system. As such, the servers select advertisements that appear to be highly likely to appeal to the users that request the advertisements. However, the servers do not know whether the advertisements that they select are actually effective. As such, if an advertisement is ineffective, the network-based advertising system may serve the advertisement to the user for a longer period of time, and as a result, the user may be exposed to more ads and associate the advertisement with the network-based advertising system than intended. v-a-i-t-n-o-n. A device used to convert an electrical or chemical energy current into mechanical energy or power: usually in the form of a rapid sequence of electrical sparks. Electricity is certainly an interesting thing to think about. According to our fancy digital plans, it's fun to get a good idea about how it's created or eliminated, how to use it in a home, and what's going on when we plug something in or turn it off. Yet, we've all probably never even been around a power socket, and we're extremely ignorant of what's actually happening when we use something like a microwave, phone charger, heat pump, or computer. So, why do you need to know a little about electricity? As I said earlier, electricity is used in an incredibly wide variety of things – computers, cell phones, TVs, microwaves, fans, emergency lighting... even heaters and air conditioners. Power = energy... you could use it to make a device run, to make energy, or to heat something. Ultimately, we like to think of electricity as something we can control, like a hot or cold shower or light switch. Yet, there's more that we don't know about what's really going on under the hood of our surroundings than we're aware of, especially when it comes to electricity. A hobby that I enjoy (and
